Labautomation'09. A great concept.

On September 10th last, we were one of the exhibitors at the Rotterdam Kuip stadium. With influential success stories. We had invited three speakers. Hein Verspaget (LUMC) talked about Integrating health care and biomedical research towards personalized medicine. Marcel Bruinenberg (Life lines) discussed LifeLines' roads....How small things get big, and Steffen Köhler (Direvo) explained the capabilities of the Direvo IBT novel screening processes. Three inspiring cases that grabbed the attention of the audience. Further particulars about all the specific technology could be obtained from our stand, which was bustling with activity. A star is born. FujiFilm introduces the QuickGene-mini80. Would you like to enter the lab and learn how this works for you in one morning or afternoon? And find out how the features of membranes have resulted in a revolutionary nucleic acid purification system? After the demonstration we invite you to propose a toast to this creation. You may now sign up for a free workshop. info@lab-services.nl

Fredriek van de Straat: "Selling means investigating the product."

Selling a good product doesn't stop at providing a great solution. I like to take things further, and become absorbed in the client's past record. Find out what the relevant items to his applications are. How he will achieve the best results. Where he sets his priorities. To enable us to provide them with underpinned advice, which must be perfectly aligned with the budget. This concisely means advice that is not only of relevance at present, but also for the future. And will hit home. It's for good reason that we have done business with reputed companies in life science and molecular biology for many years. And we are regular discussion partners and suppliers of biotechnology companies and universities.
